

October 17, 2025

Albert Regis
Texas A&M
Defensive Tackle
Height: 6010	Weight: 317	Year: 5SR	Jersey #: 17	Hometown: La Porte, TX
Games Reviewed: 2024 Utah State, Notre Dame, Auburn, Mississippi State
2025 Stats:
Career Stats:
Scouting Report by: Danny Nolan

Critical Factors
1st Step Explosion	Play Strength	Pass Rush
4	5	4
Positional Factors
Shed Ability	Hand Use	Body Control
5	5	5
Agility	Tackling	FBI
5	6	6
Discipline	Motor	Toughness
7	7	5

Strengths

- High motor
- Strong football IQ
- Strong arms and hands

Weaknesses

- Short-area quickness
- Pass rush effectiveness
- Length

Overall

Albert Regis is an intelligent, tenacious DT for the Texas A&M Aggies. He lines up primarily inside the opposing guard, but has experience over the center as well. Over his five years at Texas A&M, Regis has appeared in 44 games, starting 21 of them. He has started every game for the Aggies over the past two seasons. Regis has ample mass for the position but lacks length. He has impressive long-run and hash-to-hash speed for a player his size, though his short-area quickness leaves much to be desired. Regis sports a very high motor. He makes it tough for linemen to sustain blocks, and he will seldom be seen giving up on a play.

Run Game

In the run game, Regis functions best in a 2-gap technique. He uses his strong arms to square off an offensive lineman and fill whichever gap the ball carrier aims for. He does not have the strength nor quickness to penetrate in the run game, making the 2-gap technique the ideal way for him to make a difference. He showcases an adequate anchor and the ability to stalemate linemen at the point of attack on a sufficient number of plays. Regis' hand placement is fine and his hands are forceful, but he does not have the requisite explosiveness to consistently shed blocks and rack up tackles at the line of scrimmage. When double-teamed, he is rendered a non-factor. Thanks to his red-hot motor, he rallies to the ball well, working back to the second level and finding the ball carrier. That motor, paired with his three-yard quickness, allows him to be disruptive on stretch runs and plays that take longer to develop.

Pass Game

Against the pass, Regis struggles to consistently impact the game. He does not have a go-to pass rush move, and a mediocre bull rush is what he relies upon most. He lacks burst and does not have the footwork to compensate. His strong arms indicate potential for development, but he is currently devoid of the quickness to routinely beat linemen with a swim or rip move. He does not project as an impact player on third down. Where Regis excels is play recognition. He does a very good job of keeping his eyes in the backfield and sniffing out play action. He uses his eyes to position himself well even when he cannot generate penetration, leading to a surprising number of batted or affected passes despite his shorter frame. When the passer is moving out of the pocket, Regis is a legitimate threat to bring pressure thanks to great straight-line speed and tenacity.

Last Word

Regis projects as a rotational 3-tech in a 4-3 defensive scheme. Teams would be wise to take advantage of his 2-gap ability on early downs, but he should not see the field regularly in obvious passing situations. He lacks position flexibility, being too small to function as a run-stuffing NT and not explosive enough to move to an edge.

One-Liner: Regis lacks the physical tools needed to excel in the NFL, but his motor and play recognition ability could help him carve out a role as a rotational player.

Grade: 5.8 - Ceiling: 6.5 (15%) Floor: 5.4 (10%) Round: 6